

7 Things Your Boss Will Not Tell You

(And what to do about it)

They See Your Blindspots

01

Missed deadlines, being late, tasks that slip through the cracks; it is all being noticed.

What to do:

The small things matter, from casual remarks in a meeting to your consistency, quality and overall productivity. Pay attention and work on your mindfulness.

Bringing Them Problems, Without Solutions Is Pointless

02

Don't be a postman employee relaying issues from the frontline and bringing it to them to meaningfully solve.

What to do:

Fixes not excuses is the name of the game; leaders respect those who solve the problem. Step up.

Initiative Ranks Even Higher Than Obedience

03

Delivering expected value is the bare minimum, move your thinking to additional value.

What to do:

No ghost or coast, volunteer, pitch new ideas, take risks and know not everything requires permission.

Connecting To The Bigger Picture Is Your Responsibility

04

Understand the difference between a job and a career and become a part of the mission. You are part of a greater landscape.

What to do:

Know where you fit in and take 100% ownership of not only your deliverables but beyond.

Expecting “Thanks” For Everything Isn’t Practical

05

Praise is given when you go above and beyond, not for doing your job. The real prize is the promotion and the raise.

What to do:

The goal isn’t acceptance, its quantifiable results, don’t miss the bigger picture. Give them positive surprises, not negative or lack luster updates.

They Are Looking For Your Leadership Potential

as your output. Resolving conflict respectfully is a superpower.

The road to career development is paved with personal development. Apply empathy, coaching, active listening,
speaking with intention and inspiring
others.

Consistent Hard & Soft Skill Growth Is Necessary

07

Your active upgradation of your subject matter knowledge, and your interpersonal skills is mandatory, and your growth depends on it.
